PAY TRIBUTE TO MAJ. L'ENFANT

ington desired in the plans after L'Enfant had drafted and completed them; but the evidence goes to show that the great originality in the plan was L'Enfant's; that where the ideas in the design were original they were L'Enfant's.

It was those original ideas that the board of artists who have designed the future development of Washington have taken, and do not claim even to have improved upon.

"All Americans who take pride in the Capital and its development, therefore, must feel deep gratitude to L'Enfant for what he did and must rejoice that now, eighty-six years after his death, the time has come when we are paying him just tribute in sight of the city that he designed, in a place full of tender memories for the nation, a beautiful estate dedicated to the patriotic dead, furnishing a terminal and a proper terminal for the design of the future for the city of Washington.

"L'Enfant will now lie here appropriately in state and in rest, with the gratitude of the nation that he served so well."

Senator Root's Speech.

Following President Taft came Senator Root.

"Few men can afford to wait a hundred years to be remembered," were the opening remarks of the New Yorker.

"It is not a change in L'Enfant that brings us here. It is we who have changed—who are just becoming able to appreciate his work, and our tribute to him should be to continue his work."

Pointing toward the shining city across the broad river, he said:

"There is L'Enfant's monument. A man's work is his monument, known or whether it be forever forgotten or brought to light again. And our tribute to us testify to our faith by our works. Let us continue the work of L'Enfant in the enlargement of the Capital with a thought of his spirit."

Tribute by Jussereand.

Then Ambassador Jussereand spoke. He said:

Speech by the French Ambassador.

"By the million year, on ships more and more numerous, loaded to the brim with human cargoes, immigrants, travelers, tourists, men of business, men of leisure, visit the United States. The majority of them see this land for the first time. Without exception they are struck by its immensity, its resources, the number of its inhabitants, nearing now a hundred million. All of those who visit the Federal city are unanimous in their praise of its beauty and its exact adaptation to the needs of a great nation."

"With the mind of a poet, with the soul of a prophet, perceiving future ages as clearly as if they were the present, a man foresaw, over a century ago, what we now see with our eyes; and that man is the one who lies under the monument which a generous vote of Congress allows to dedicate to-day, Maj. Pierre Charles L'Enfant."

"A Parisian born, the son of a royal painter at the manufacture of the Gobelins, having grown up among artistic surroundings, L'Enfant embraced at twenty-three the cause of the United States, and could, as justly as Lafayette, say: 'When I heard of American independence my heart enlisted.' He came in fact, being then a lieutenant of engineers on one of those ships belonging to Beaumarchais' mythical firm of Horlaes & Co., a firm whose cargoes consisted in soldiers and ammunition for the insurgents, and as such, he was a Frenchman."

"Selling on the vessel named after that great friend of the American cause, Count Vergennes, the French foreign minister, L'Enfant crossed the ocean a month before another ship with another appropriate name reached these shores, that other ship was called La Victoire, and it bore Lafayette."

Built Fort Washington.

"One of his works was the building of what is now called Fort Washington. Another, and more important, that for which he has become famous, was the one to which his remains were transferred here after having lain in state under the dome of the Capitol, and his merits celebrated by Vice President Sherman, the one on account of which he now enjoys the supreme honor of the presence at this ceremony of the respected successor of George Washington, President Taft—that one was the planning of the Federal city."

"What the speaker is everybody knows. Each of the planners of to-day lives in streets marked on L'Enfant's maps, and so do all the persons present at this meeting who have not inhabited the suburbs, what might be called Greater Washington. The original of the map is preserved in the Library of Congress, and any one can verify the truth of what I say."

"But more striking than the merits of this plan, unanimously praised, so soon at least as its adaptation to the great need that was to be met, is the understanding of the date at which L'Enfant conceived it."

"Long was the delay, bitter the irony, merciless were the jokes. For half a century, half the years the city now counts, no traveler visited the city named after the founder of the country, that did not deride in his notes that city of magnificent distances, that town of streets without houses and houses without streets, that town in derelict waste, waiting for the day when it should be a city of 200,000 inhabitants."

City Meant for Us.

"L'Enfant had not dreamed of that. He had foreseen that, and much more. The city he planned was meant not for the men of his day, but for those of ours, and when the time shall come that people will wonder at our own country at the rapid expansion of this city, when the hundred million inhabitants of to-day will look a petty number, still L'Enfant's plan will hold good, and for our successors, as for us, he will be able to say: 'For you it was that I worked.'"

"Great, therefore, as is the honor now bestowed on him, when such men as President Taft, and with him, Senator Root, have come to render homage to his memory, when the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and those of to-day—acting in accord with the chief historical and artistic society of the city, have united their efforts to have his services duly recognized, great as are such tributes, it cannot be said that they are undesired. Now, monument marks the place where the wounded soldier of Savannah, the defender of the Clinch Mountain, the builder of Fort Mifflin and Washington, the author of the plan of the Federal city sleeps his last sleep. And it was in the fitness of things that the monument for a man born in the manufactory of the Gobelins be designed by a pupil of the Beaux Arts."

"On this hill, from which is discovered one of the finest sights in the world, the city of beautiful buildings and shady avenues that he would rise to see a great city for a great nation, L'Enfant now rests among his peers. He fought for American independence, he believed in the future of the country, he will rest in the midst of that army of the dead, who in their lifetime, at the sad hour of another great struggle, saved the Union."

Relative of Benefactor.

Miss Elvira Carroll Morgan is granddaughter of William Dudley Digges, the wealthy Maryland farmer, who, when Maj. L'Enfant dropped from the rolls of the army he had honored, was in distress and poverty in the city he had founded, offered him asylum. It was to the Digges farm that the old engineer repaired in the days of his adversity. Here, on June 14, 1852, at the age of seventy-one, he died. On June 15, the anniversary of the day that the flag he had fought for and lived for and honored was first flung to the breeze, the man who had created Washington passed on, an object of charity and a pensioner upon the bounty of a friend.

In April, 1899, backed with a Congressional appropriation of $100,000, the citizens of Washington destroyed the body of Maj. L'Enfant from the grave in the Digges farm cemetery, at Chatham Manor, Prince George County, Md., and conveyed it in a new casket to Arlington. Yesterday's ceremony marks the concluding chapter in the effort of the nation to properly and adequately do honor to the memory of its earliest modern city maker.

The design of the new sarcophagus preserves the colonial design in all its details. It is built of Knoxville gray stone. The base is eleven feet long by seven feet six inches in width—a single block. Carved upon the surface of the upper face of the sarcophagus is a record of the colonial period in high relief. About it is entwined a wreath of laurel. Upon the capstone of the monument is reproduced L'Enfant's first map of Washington. So close to the present plan of the city is this reproduction that only an expert can detect the difference.

Designed the Memorial.

The monument was designed by W. W. Bosworth and the stone work was done by M. J. Falvey, of this city. Mr. Falvey also built pedestals for the monuments to Baron von Steuben and Gen. Kosciuszko at Lafayette Square.

Caring to the unavoidable absence from the city of Cardinal Gibbons, the invocation and benediction were pronounced by Mr. William T. Russell, pastor of St. Patrick's Church. Mr. Russell was especially selected for this office by the cardinal.

Society Well Represented.

Society was well represented at the exercises. Some of those present were: Senator O. O. Bacon, Senator Luke Lee, Representative Henry S. De Forest, Senator Francis G.
